Community Informed Policies and Gender Justice—an ASEAN Higher Education Story

Achieving gender equality and true liberation for women means to hold space and power for women in politics, in social life, and in economic development, all the way from household level to governing bodies. Community Informed Policies on gender justice and inclusivity can serve a useful mechanism in fostering a society that is safe for women and marginalised identities. ASEAN higher education has long been a space for educators, activists, community leaders to apply an explicit gendered and resource equity lens to its policy and research agenda. It is thus essential for ASEAN universities to be involved in the efforts of fostering an active accountability mechanism to ensure gender justice and inclusion, making use of community-engaged research in producing practical policy proposals suitable for the regional context.
